1. what you did,

The following activities and research are what I did with the funding of this program

(1). Library research in various places, including:

(a). Wuhan University, Beijing University, Chinese Academy of Social Sciences;

(b). The University of Melbourne and La Trobe University in Australia;

(c). Online library research.

(2). Published a part of this research in an essay on Social Sciences Abroad (2017, Vol. 4), the essay titled “A view on the predicament of Contemporary Chinese Studies from the current situation of overseas Chinese Economic Textbooks” (从海外中国经济教材现状看当代中国研究的困境)

(3). Consulted and discussed this research topic in various institutions with scholars from China, Japan, the United States, Australia and South Korea.

(4). Parts of my research has been compiled into a research guide on Japanese China studies in the area of Sino-Japanese relations.

2. in case, you did overseas business trip, please describe your research activity in your trip

Since my Japanese language skill is limited, it is cost-effective for me to conduct this research in an English environment. Due to the amount of funding, however, I have travelled only to Melbourne, Australia and South Korea to collect research materials and discuss my research with relevant scholars. These include the University of Melbourne and La Trobe University in Australia, and a meeting held by Seoul National University in Jeju do, South Korea. During my trips, I contacted Japanese experts, and discussed my research results with them.

3. what you found, what was the result through your research,

The Japanese perception of China is complex and controversial. I here summarized my finding as follows:

(1). In general, China study in Japanese gradually recognized that China’s development model has some advantages in enhancing China’s economy, while a major understanding in the China studies circle is that China has a possibility in catching up, or even surpassing, the United States in terms of national GDP in the future.

(2). The China Model, however, is an authoritarian model of social and economic development. This model is certainly not a model for the world to learn from, neither could other Chinese establishments be examples for the world to follow, including Chinese mechanism of innovation, Chinese value system, and social culture. In general, Chinese value, or even the value of East Asia, can hardly take the place of Western values as universal guiding principles for all human beings.

(3). There are periodic upturns and downturns in Sino-Japanese relationship in recent decades. Even though

China's rise and assertiveness have been the main reasons behind the deterioration of Sino-Japanese relationship since 2010, the good relationship between Japan and China should be based on the change of the stereotyped old thinking on China, and on the Japanese self-perception based on the history of recent 100 years.

(4). China studies in Japan, like the same research field in America, may have a direct impact on the decision-making of political figures. It is, hence, not merely an academic issue of the perception of Japanese scholars on China Model, and on the changes of China's foreign policy towards Japan. It is thus a vital factor in Sino-Japanese relationship for the exchange of ideas between Japanese scholars and Chinese scholars on a frequent scale.

4. what is your advice if any you have,

My suggestion to Chinese government is that the universal value in international relationship should be the guiding principle of China's foreign policy in practice, while the East Asian countries are no longer in the traditional tributary system, and are not willing to go back to an ancient international system.

5. what kind of action will be required in future etc through your research.

If it is possible, I would like to continue this research, since Sino-Japanese relationship is coming to a threshold of becoming amicable again, while the China Model is facing a serious test of sustainable development.
